

Sake Deen Mahomet

THE TRAVELS OF
DEAN MAHOMET,

A NATIVE OF PATNA IN BENGAL,

THROUGH SEVERAL PARTS OF

INDIA,

While in the Service of The Honourable
THE EAST INDIA COMPANY.

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF,
In a Series of Letters to a Friend.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

VOL. II.

CORK:

PRINTED BY J. CONNOR,

At the Circulating Library, No. 17, Corner of Castle Street opposite the Square.

1794

177 pp.

but generous animal took it up gently, gave it suck, and afterwards laid it down in the cradle with the utmost solicitude. This tendernefs, which is not unlike gratitude in our species, proceeded from the kind treatment of it's keeper.

An elephant is commonly fold by meafurement; and some of thofe animals, which are young and well trained, are purchafed at the rate of 150 rupees per cubit: they are meafured from the head to the tail, which is about feven cubits long, and at this calculation will amount to above one hundred pounds fterling each.

Next to the elephant in bulk and H 2 figure,

figure, is the rhinoceros, called by the modern Indians, abadu; it is not unlike the wild boar, but much larger, having thicker feet, and a more unwieldy body. It is covered with large hard scales of a blackish colour, which are divided into small squares, raised a little above the skin, and nearly resembling those of the crocodile. It's head, which is large, is wrapped up behind in a kind of capuchin; it's mouth is little; but its snout extends to a great length, and is armed with a long thick horn, which makes him terrible to other animals, it's tongue is as rough as a file, and a sort of wings like those of the bat, cover the belly.

In